"9/11 AIR IS SAFE TO BREATHE" — NOW DIE!

"Never trust government lies" – POGO. The headline statement was made by former governor Christine Todd Whitman who was head of the E.P.A. (Environmental Protection Agency) at the time of 9/11.

Collusion

By: Dr. A. H. Krieg

The collusion between banking and governments i.e. the FRS, BoE and ECB with major banks is now complete. The inseparable triad is at the verge of their long-planned single world currency. Stopping or opposing this inevitable N W O plan is no longer a viable idea. The bond between government, legislative as well as executive with banksters forms an unbeatable combination. The last opposition of any note was Andrew Jackson and there is no present day version of "Old Hickory" in the woodwork, in fact there is no leader of any note on the horizon here or abroad. The lengthy train of banking control of economies goes all the way back to the founder of modern banking Nathan Amschel Rothschild. (1780's to 1812)

In the modern era the Fabian socialists began to develop and then control the British Labor Party, then the American Democrat Party and while all that was transpiring the Keynesian's socialists took over the economic banking systems through the 1944 Bretton Woods meeting in NH. Today they call themselves the "Progressives" and there are about 75 of them in the American legislative bodies. Elizabeth Warren, Hillary Clinton, Barack Obama, and Jeb Bush are all progressives that support Keynesian economics. All Fabians support the Keynesian economic model that has so devastated our world economy.

Capitalism and its gold and silver backed monetary system is the root of all-evil through its instance of hard money backing, according to the progressives. The actual reality being that so long as fiat was issued, backed by gold and silver, economies did well, it was af-

Counter-Intelligence Database

The U.S. military is at a crisis point.

We are staring down the barrel of a future where U.S. military technological superiority may no longer be a given where the military strength that has undergirded global security since World War II may be in question. The technologies that have given the U.S. military its edge—stealth, long-range sensors, communications networks and precision-guided weapons—are proliferating to other actors. As a result, so-called “anti-access” challenges threaten traditional modes of power projection. While individual U.S. ships, planes and tanks remain more capable one-on-one, the pernicious “death spiral” of rising costs and shrinking procurement quantities means that the United States has increasingly fewer and fewer assets to bring to the fight. The U.S. military will have to fight significantly outnumbered, and even the qualitative advantages U.S. assets have will not be sufficient. Quality matters, but numbers matter too. At a certain point, U.S. aircraft and ships will simply run out of missiles.

“If the U.S. military is to maintain its technological edge, it will need to harness the advantages of the robotics revolution and build the swarm.”

(Not So) Fun Facts

The Global Refugee Crisis

Tens of thousands of people are fleeing civil war and unrest to find new homes in Europe—sometimes with tragic consequences. The U.N. estimates that more people have been displaced than at any time since World War II.

German Vice Chancellor Sigmar Gabriel says his country will accept 500,000 asylum-seekers a year for the next several years.

But this does not mean all of those migrants will be allowed to stay in Germany.

Over the past weeks, public attitudes towards refugees pouring out of Syria have begun to shift dramatically. Leaders in France, Germany, and Britain announced that their countries would step up their efforts to take in refugees.

large and diverse population had different exposures after the collapse of the World Trade Center (WTC), and health effects have varied as a result.

More than a decade of studies suggest that while the majority of people exposed to the WTC disaster are healthy and symptom free, thousands of individuals—including rescue, recovery and clean-up workers and people who lived, worked or went to school in Lower Manhattan on 9/11—have developed chronic, and often co-occurring, mental and physical health conditions.

Mental Health

- Large epidemiological studies conducted by the Health Department’s NYC WTC Health Registry suggest that post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) symptoms are the most common health effect of 9/11. Experienced by as many as 20% of adults who were directly exposed to the WTC disaster, this is roughly four times the rate of PTSD symptoms typically found in the general population.

Risk factors for probable PTSD included:

- Intense dust cloud exposure or suffering an injury on 9/11
- Being on a high floor of the World Trade Center, evacuating late or working for an employer that sustained fatalities.
- Witnessing horror or knowing someone killed or injured on 9/11
- Little or no social support after 9/11
- Respiratory illness

Respiratory Illness

- Those exposed to WTC-related dust were more likely to develop respiratory symptoms, sinus problems, asthma or lung problems. One in 10 Registry enrollees developed new-onset asthma within six years of 9/11, three times the national rate. New cases were highest during the first 16 months after 9/11.

- Both epidemiologic and clinical studies demonstrate substantial co-morbidity (co-occurrence) of respiratory illness and mental health conditions in WTC-exposed groups.

Heart Disease

- Those with multiple injuries sustained on 9/11 and 9/11-related PTSD had a three-fold higher risk of heart disease than those with no injury and no PTSD.

Other Illnesses

- Several studies have suggested that WTC exposure is associated with sarcoidosis (an inflammation that can affect any organ, but typically affects the lungs) among rescue, recovery and clean-up workers who worked on the debris pile. However, these studies cannot rule out the possibility that increased medical attention and testing may be responsible for the detected increases in sarcoidosis rates among WTC workers.

Cancer

- Although cancer takes many years, even decades, to develop, three early WTC cancer studies based on diagnoses confirmed through 2008 have been published. This research suggests that long-term monitoring of cancer occurrence among WTC-exposed individuals is warranted:

- The New York City Fire Department (FDNY) found that nearly 9,000 firefighters with WTC exposure may be at greater risk for cancer than firefighters who weren’t exposed.

Mortality

- The only WTC-related mortality study to be published showed that WTC Registry enrollees were less likely to die in the eight years of follow-up than people in the general New York City population. However, the study also showed that among Lower Manhattan residents, area workers and passersby in the Registry, those with higher levels of WTC exposure may be at greater risk for all-cause mortality and cardiac-related mortality, especially compared to people with intermediate or lower levels of WTC exposure.

Monitoring and Treatment for 9/11-Related Health Conditions

No matter where they live now, people affected by 9/11 are eligible for treatment and medication with no out-of-pocket costs at the WTC Health Program. The Program includes New York City’s three Centers of Excellence and the National Provider Network.

The Centers and the WTC Health Registry—all funded by the federal government—continue to provide clinicians, epidemiologists and other researchers with the kind of evidence that, over time, will help answer some of the current unknowns. Their ongoing work will help better identify the people who are at greatest risk for becoming ill and further refine treatment options for people who already are sick. S

Conclusions by Pogo:

1. The approximately 3,000 deaths on 9/11 are only the tip of the iceberg.
2. Cancer deaths, in 14 years since 9/11, are expanding expediently.
3. Christine Todd Whitman, like most government employees, is a liar.
